

Advancing the understanding and practice of participatory medicine among health care professionals and patients

Open access | Peer reviewed | PMC, Scopus, DOAJ, EBSCO indexed

The Journal of Participatory Medicine (JoPM) is the official journal of the Society for Participatory Medicine. The journal's mission is to transform the culture of medicine by providing an evidence base for participatory health and medicine. JoPM aims to advance both science and practice across various participatory medicine focus areas, including patient and caregiver empowerment and lived experience; patient-clinician partnership improving health and health care patient-facing technology design and use producing improved patients' health and health care; co-design, participatory design, and citizen science; and patient and public involvement in research and care delivery.

JoPM publishes six manuscript types: research articles, editorials, narratives, case reports, reviews, and updates on related research in other media. Published manuscripts explore how patient participation affects outcomes, resources, and relationships in health care; interventions optimizing patient participation; and data informing evidence-based practice.
